Objective Medical Evidence. Objective evidence is evidence that is not based on your statements. Instead, objective evidence is medical tests. These tests include x-rays, MRIs, nerve conduction studies, CT scans, arterial studies, and echocardiograms. SSA places great weight on objective evidence. This is probably because these objective studies do not lie or exaggerate.

Providing evidence of your medical treatment will allow you to prove part of your damages or injuries in your claim. Medical bills and records are used in practically every personal injury claim because they establish a consistent account of when and where you were treated, which providers you were treated by, and what treatment you received. With this in mind, make sure that you seek medical attention after the accident.
